Summary

- After five consecutive days of losses, US indices achieved gains on Thursday; their European peers closed mixed.
- After Thursday's market close, Nike's quarterly results opened the reporting season; the manufacturer's revenues and profits missed expectations.
- US jobless figures have beaten expectations, but the awaited slight revision of Q2 GDP did not take place.

Recovering from five consecutive days of losses, American indices achieved gains on Thursday. Meanwhile, their European peers closed mixed. The advance in the USA may have benefited from the better-than-expected labour market data, but there were factors that hindered it: the awaited slight revision of Q2 GDP did not take place, and the House Speaker, the Republican John Boehner insisted on spending cuts to accompany the higher debt ceiling.

After Thursday's market close, Nike published its quarterly results, marking the beginning of the reporting season (because of its declining stock price, Alcoa dropped from the Dow Jones index). The sports apparel manufacturer came up with worse-than-expected figures, in terms of both revenues and profit.

The better-than-expected labour market data raised oil price and slashed that of the gold. The dollar slightly firmed versus the euro.
