Summary

- Investor sentiment was negative in Europe on Tuesday.
- US stock indices are likely to move sideways in 2016, according to Goldman Sachs.
- The Fed has tightened rules pertaining to inspectors.

Investors were rather unenthusiastic in yesterday's session in Europe. The DAX and the CAC40 dropped 1.4% each, and the FTSE100 closed 0.45% lower. The engine of Renault Espace may exceed nitrogen-oxide emission limits by 5-25 times, tests in Switzerland found. Unlike in the case of VW, this discrepancy was not caused by software settings. Russia's move to close the gas taps to Ukraine (and provide gas only on prepayment) may threaten Europe's gas supplies through Ukraine. Ukraine's gas reserves can last until the end of the year, and the problems may surface in January.

Trading in America was modestly optimistic, partly owing to the cheering US GDP figure. The DJIA and the S&P 500 both dropped 0.1%, the Russel2000 grew by 0.7%, while the NASDAQ100 shed 0.1%. Goldman Sachs's 2016 forecast expects US equity indices to move sideways next year, and it predicts higher US interest rates than the current market opinion. GS's analysts put the S&P 500 at or near 2,100, pointing out that despite the increasing interest rates, businesses' rising profits may put corporate P/E figures under negative pressure. On Tuesday the Fed announced that the inspectors examining big banks would face stricter requirements from now on. This is the Fed's answer to criticism that it is not strict enough in checking the big banks on the Wall Street.

Asia's stock indices were slightly in the red this morning. The Nikkei sank 0.4% and the Hang Seng shed 0.1%.

The price of oil grew almost 3% yesterday, bringing the week/week increase closer to 5%. The Brent was seen nudging 0.1% higher and gold advanced 0.3% this morning.

The breakdown of Germany's GDP data matched expectations: the economy grew by 0.3% quarter/quarter and by 1.8% year/year. The November IFO sentiment index was better than had been thought. In the second estimate, America's GDP was revised from 1.5% to 2.1%; and the GDP deflator, at 1.3% has beaten expectations. The Case-Shiller home price index was up 0.6% between August and September, also overshooting forecasts. Today's important statistics include industrial orders and retail sales data from Italy. The raft of data to be published in the USA includes building permits, new home sales, durable goods and PCE inflation statistics.
