Summary

- The EUR/RON changed little on Wednesday too; today all eyes will be on the Fed's policy meeting.
- The ROBOR 3M hit a new historical low at 0.70% yesterday.
- Equity markets pointed to modest movements, ahead of today's important monetary updates.

Similarly to the previous few days, the EUR/RON showed little variation on Wednesday, inching up only marginally. Among the CEE region's currencies, the Hungarian HUF showed somewhat higher swings, after the country's central bank announced new policy easing measures. Today all eyes will be on the Federal Reserves' monetary decisions.

The majority of interbank lending rates eased on Tuesday. The ROBOR 3M, probably the most closely followed reference rate for debtors with variable interest rate hit a new record low at 0.70%, easing by 2 bps in a day. Compared to the end of August, all benchmark rates declined, pointing to falls in the range of 3-8 basis points, most likely fuelled by rising excess liquidity on the interbank money market.

On the main global equity markets, investors appeared to be reluctant to take large positions a day before the policy meetings in Japan and the USA. Accordingly, the key European indices did not show large movements yesterday, while US stocks also finished broadly flat. Neither did the BET bring too much excitement, as it eked out only a small gain (+0.2%), while its components moved in different directions, with the shares of the BVB advancing the most (+1.6%) and with the BRD recording the weakest performance, slumping 1.1%. Stock markets could start well today, after the Bank of Japan decided to launch new stimulus this morning.
