Summary

- Friday's trading was slightly pessimistic.
- Angela Merkel announced to run for fourth term as chancellor in 2017.
- The greenback extended its gains vs the euro.

In Friday's slightly negative sentiment on global markets, the DAX and the S&P500 slipped 0.2% each. Advancing 0.3%, the dollar continued its winning streak against the single European currency. The USD appreciated 0.8% against the JPY and 0.5% compared to the GBP. A research by Deutsche Bank estimates that the S&P500 may rise to 2,250 by the time Donald Trump is inaugurated and reach 2,500 by 2018. Deutsche Bank explained the higher target price with the tax cuts and long-term fiscal stimulus expected in Trump presidency.

In Sunday's meeting of her CDU party, Angela Merkel announced to run for a fourth term as Germany's chancellor in 2017. In current opinion polls, the approval rate of the coalition of Merkel's CDU party and CSU is 33%, about 10 percentage points ahead of SPD. Angela Merkel is supported by 55% of respondents.

Crude prices slightly upped in Friday's trading, while that of gold was 0.7% down. According to the Wall Street Journal's sources, Iraq will submit in the next OPEC meeting three new proposals about how to implement the cap on production. This is important because it was Iraq's output that had jumped to record high, suggesting its unwillingness to observe the preliminary agreement.

Asia ended a sanguine trading session this morning. The Nikkei upped 0.8% despite the discouraging foreign trade data released earlier in the morning. The Hang Seng edged 0.1% higher.

Japan's foreign trade statistics missed expectations, but a major fall in imports caused foreign trade surplus for the second month in a row.

There are no more macroeconomic figures to be released today but Mario Draghi's speech in the afternoon may be a market-moving one. The most important question regarding the ECB's monetary policy is whether it will extend its current asset purchase programme, and with what conditions. Not least important is what Mr Draghi will say about government bond yields, which have been rising since Donald Trump was elected.
