Global Daily Report

Summary

- Europe's equity markets dropped
- America's indices picked up on Monday
- The US dollar extended its loss against the EUR

Europe opened the week modestly as the US air strike in Syria added to geopolitical concerns, rather than soothing investors. The Stoxx600 closed 0.4% down, as did the DAX, while the FTSE shed 0.9%. The EUR's appreciation did not benefit Europe's exporters. Meanwhile the GBP firmed 0.7% versus the USD, pushing the pair to a two-year low of 1.4333.

The USA eked out slight gains on Monday as the beginning of the Q1 earnings report season made investors sanguine. The figures of Bank of America and of Charles Schwab beat expectations; Netflix's report came after market hours. One sign of Monday's general upbeat mood was that all of the S&P's sector indices could climb higher; the benchmark's 0.8% rise was largely fuelled by utilities, raw materials and consumption sectors, while financial and healthcare names underperformed. The S&P's Monday growth brought the index's year-to-date performance into positive territory. The technology sector advanced too; its biggest players gained 1–1.5%. Exceptions included Facebook, which failed to return to previous levels, NVidia closed just below 0, Oracle edged 0.1% lower, and Qualcomm fell 1.7%. The healthcare sector was dragged down by Bristol-Myers-Squibb's 8% nose-dive, as its lung cancer treatment was found less efficient than Merck's similar solution, thus its rival is likely to face an upsurge in sales. Merck's share price soared 2.6% after the report. Goldman Sachs, IBM and Johnson & Johnson will all publish their reports today.

There were sharp moves on commodity markets on Monday. The WTI crude oil slid 1.7%, while the Brent surged 1.6%. Aluminium price jumped 5% in London, owing to the Russia sanctions.

The retail sales figures released in the USA yesterday indicated stronger-than-expected month/month growth, after shrinking in February. The New York Fed manufacturing index fell sharper than had been thought.

Today's interesting macroeconomic releases include China's Q1 GDP data, the April reading of Germany's ZEW economic sentiment index, and US housing market statistics.

Asia's markets closed in the red this morning. The macroeconomic data on China did not surprise, only the March reading of retail sales topped economists' forecast.
